				RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL - OCTOBER 17: A member of an indigenous community (C) walks to the Aldeia Maracana building they are occupying next to Maracana Stadium (Top L), the site of the 2014 World Cup finals, while giving a tour of the area to visitors on October 17, 2013 in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The fading Aldeia Maracana used to house the Museum of Indian Culture before deteriorating and becoming occupied by squatting indigenous members in 2006. The building was slated for destruction ahead of the 2014 World Cup and the community was forcibly evicted in March. However, the community has managed to return and thus far have successfully battled to save the structure, which they hope to convert into an indigenous university. Indigenous groups throughout Brazil are battling the Brazilian government over land rights and other issues. (Photo by Mario Tama/Getty Images)

450562159	VA0002456171		Peruvian Gold Mining Rush Brings Social And Environmental Stresses To Amazon	MADRE DE DIOS REGION, PERU - NOVEMBER 17: A miner looks on as National Police officers search for illegal mining operations in a deforested section of the Amazon lowlands ravaged by mining on November 17, 2013 in Madre de Dios region, Peru. Police eventually destroyed three pieces of illegal mining equipment in the area. The biologically diverse Madre de Dios (Mother of God) region has seen deforestation from gold mining in the area triple since 2008, when gold prices spiked during global economic turmoil. Small-scale miners are drawn to the area in hopes for higher pay but often face abysmal conditions. Gold is usually amalgamated with mercury during the process of informal mining in the region, which is discharged into the water supply and air, poisoning fish and sickening people in the area. Peru is the largest producer of gold in Latin America and the sixth-largest in the world. Informal mining accounts for roughly 20 percent of the gold production in Peru. The biologically diverse Madre de Dios ('Mother of God') region has seen deforestation from gold mining in the area triple since 2008, when gold prices spiked during global economic turmoil. Small-scale miners are drawn to the area in hopes for higher pay but often face abysmal conditions. Gold is usually amalgamated with mercury during the process of informal mining in the region, which is discharged into the water supply and air, poisoning fish and sickening people in the area. Peru is the largest producer of gold in Latin America and the sixth-largest in the world. Informal mining accounts for roughly 20 percent of the gold production in Peru. Police eventually destroyed three pieces of illegal mining equipment in the area. The biologically diverse Madre de Dios (Mother of God) region has seen deforestation from gold mining in the area triple since 2008, when gold prices spiked during global economic turmoil. Small-scale miners are drawn to the area in hopes for higher pay but often face abysmal conditions. Gold is usually amalgamated with mercury during the process of informal mining in the region, which is discharged into the water supply and air, poisoning fish and sickening people in the area. Peru is the largest producer of gold in Latin America and the sixth-largest in the world. Informal mining accounts for roughly 20 percent of the gold production in Peru. Mead had lived in the $380/month apartment for 34 years and was battling with a developer who is converting the rest of the building's apartments into market rate apartments. The Lower East Side is one of many New York neighborhoods where gentrification is occurring, where landlords frequently employ various methods to remove long-time residents from rent controlled apartments in order to convert them into market rate dwellings. Mead said loud construction occurred every morning in the building starting at 7:00 am until evening along with dust problems from the construction. His apartment was in disrepair before the construction began and Mead finally reached an agreement with the landlord before moving out April 9. (Photo by Mario Tama/Getty Images)

Police eventually destroyed three pieces of illegal mining equipment in the area. The biologically diverse Madre de Dios ('Mother of God') region has seen deforestation from gold mining in the area triple since 2008, when gold prices spiked during global economic turmoil. Small-scale miners are drawn to the area in hopes for higher pay but often face abysmal conditions. Gold is usually amalgamated with mercury during the process of informal mining in the region, which is discharged into the water supply and air, poisoning fish and sickening people in the area. Peru is the largest producer of gold in Latin America and the sixth-largest in the world. Informal mining accounts for roughly 20 percent of the gold production in Peru. 175702922	VA0002456172		Central Americans Undertake Grueling Journey Through Mexico To U.S.	INTERPEAC, MEXICO - AUGUST 08: Central American immigrants arrive on top of a freight train on August 6, 2013 to Ixtapee, Mexico. Thousands of Central American migrants ride the trains, known as 'la bestia', or the beast, during their long and perilous journey north through Mexico to reach the United States border. Some of the immigrants are robbed and assaulted by gangs who control the train tops, while others fall asleep and tumble down, losing limbs or perishing under the wheels of the trains. Only a fraction of the immigrants who start the journey in Central America will traverse Mexico completely unscathed - and all this before illegally entering the United States and facing the considerable U.S. border security apparatus designed to track, detain and deport them.
